URBAN YOUTH AND SOCIAL CHANGE IN NAIROBI

In 2025, Nairobi has become one of Africa's fastest-growing cities, attracting youth from across Kenya in search of education, jobs, and better lifestyles. The rise of technology, new media, and modern education systems has transformed how young people interact, dress, and communicate. However, this rapid change has also created tensions between traditional cultural expectations and modern values.

Many families struggle to adapt, as elders feel that cultural norms such as respect for authority, communal living, and marriage traditions are being undermined. Religious institutions are also debating how to respond to the growing influence of globalization and modernization. Meanwhile, high unemployment and urban poverty force many young people into informal work, social activism, or migration abroad.

Sociologists argue that Nairobi's transformation reflects deeper changes in Kenya's social structure and culture. They note that while modernization brings opportunities for empowerment and creativity, it also increases social inequality and weakens traditional support systems. Others believe that youth resistance to outdated customs is necessary for progress.

The government has attempted to manage the challenges through youth empowerment programs, education reforms, and policies promoting innovation. Yet, resistance from conservative groups remains strong. Many citizens are divided between preserving tradition and embracing new ways of life. This situation reflects broader debates about the meaning of social change in Kenya: Who benefits, who is left behind, and how should society adapt?
